The New Man as a Citizen.-The ndividual beads do not constitute a seeklace. The cord that passes through them explains the sinuous grace, with which they lie upon the bosom of beauty. Sever the cord and the collective grace is gone. The new man, as a citizen, understands fully that the one thing which imparts value and interest to his life is the fact of his being in and of and permeated by racial claims. He knows-and it moulds his life-that were he thrust out alone and defenseless into the wilds of forest land he would wage a josing battle against the boisterous forces of nature. Part of his political creed, therefore, is that the best things of life-the protection, the mutual aid, the transfer of helpful ideas and almost perfect supremacy over nature-come from the fact that he holds by his fellows and his fellows hold by him. Consequently the new man, as a citizen, is opposed in every man for himself and the De'il take the citizens who are ruled. He is against thievery and jobbery in high places and equally against apathy and neglect of stinet and that self-preservation is the first law, for he can show you numberless evidences from the history of this Crute's Drug Store. self-sacrifice-even unto death-to have been the highest possible gain to the race as a whole. In the continuation of the discussion he will insist that you do not drag it down to the indias it brings beauty and strength and honor to the glorious whole of which it is a minor part.

The new man, as a citizen, is going "Did he die rich or did he gain indiourselves thin over a broad area and feel sure of a first class road of which they will feel so proud that the good work will have to be continued until our county has the macadam from one and to the other.

How many articles do you possess of more all value to you, yet could be turned into money by selling them to some one who does need them? I will, for a and whose burdens are borne most commission, place these articles before heavily by this.

S. W. PAULETT, JR. prompt to acknowledge that every great question has two sides. Consequently though he will not be lacking in very definite opinions upon all public questions, yet flerce partisanship will be far from him and, in its place, only courtesy and charity towards those who oppose him. > The new man, as a citizen, is going to bring to pass a better day of cleaner polities; for he is to declare that a man who is morally untit for his companionship or the courtesies of his home is politically unfit to receive his vote, He understands that notwithstanding those who see with him are few at present, yet their strength is not to be counted by numbers; for he has the utmost faith in the pervasive power of a right idea. The increase of his kind will bring back into political life men of strong character and of leisure. He will demand as time progresses more and more real trust of the people, so that we shall hope to see as part of the machinery of future government the referendum vote by reason of which all important actions of a legislature shall be referred back to the people themselves for a final decision. And his contention will be that while-alas! -bad legislation can be bought by schemes among a few men the purchase of the majority of the voters in a State would be out of the question. But running along beside his efforts to give the people a real voice will be a constant effort to educate our mixed classes up to a better realization of their privileges as men and as Amer-
